William is a hard workaholic who is busy at his office 24/7. He works so hard that he often needs a break from work and luckily, he has some free time. With that said, William wants to play video games. However, William has a distaste for modern video games and prefers video games that were made in the 1990s-2000s. He is also quite picky about what types. William does not like video games that have only one specific type of gameplay (e.g, fighting games where you choose an attack for battles). He likes games that have multiple game modes all together (like a "maze navigation", "fighting game", and other styles combined). In addition, he likes games to have a "nostalgic" feel to them (such as games in the style of Adobe Flash). William likes this game, but it is played on HTML and requires a browser. Therefore, it'd be hard to play on his cell phone, as the cell phone has different controls. Given that said, there will be some functions, such as buttons, that will have to be modified to work on cell phones (possibly mousedown effects).

William:

Allison is a girl who lives far from town. She lives on the countryside and has expressed interest in playing video games. But there is a problem: she has not played video games before and might not know the gameplay of the game itself. Therefore, controls and a tutorial could be assigned at the start of the game to allow Allison to get used to the game itself.

Fawkes is a gamer who is a big-time nerd. He has played Halo before, but he doesn't play PvP; instead, he plays the campaign because he likes following the storyline of games. He likes superheroes and Star Wars, but he is desperate to find another game to be entertained by as he pretty much knows his favorite franchises like the back of his hand, and he wants to look into another franchise/game with a campaign. There is a problem: Fawkes likes franchises with a diversity of characters (e.g, different races, sexes, etc.). This game will have characters of all types with different personalities to satisfy Fawkes.
